Adult Neuropsychological Intake Questionnaire

Please complete this questionnaire as best you can. This type of information is very helpful in making an accurate assessment and diagnosis. We will be discussing the information shared in this form in detail at the time of your intake appointment.

B. PURPOSE OF EVALUATION

What are your primary concerns? (Include onset of injury/illness and symptoms)

I struggle with time management and I've always struggled with time management. I am often always late, but it is to varying degrees - sometimes small amounts, sometimes significant amounts. It also often takes me longer to do things than it would take other people.

I need very specific conditions of quiet and light and space to focus and do homework, which right now and growing up, I was able to provide for myself but in some times when this is challenging to get, I struggle (I hear everything, often down to the air-conditioning and that is sometimes very frustrating and challenging and also cannot multi-task so frustrating/challenging when other people are talking). I have heightened senses in general and used to struggle a lot with sensory issues in clothing, this has lessened but still exists.

Depending on the class, I have a hard time focusing / absorbing content in class. This has kind of always been the case where in order to learn content, I must actively study or engage with it (I am an experiential learner) but I think my highschool classes were more interactive, so sometimes its a challenge in college when I sit in class and pay attention, but am not absorbing. This also often means self-studying.

Last year, I was having heightened frustrations. In part of the year, I was over-extended and not able to time manage enough where I was not completing some work on time. In another part of the year, in attempts of compensating, I was under-extended and not having enough purpose in my days so I was feeling unmotivated. There were some other sensory related challenges that also were difficult. This led me to recognizing I do things to the feeling of "just right" like when moving items, order of putting on clothes, etc. and this was very prominent last year, but not so much this year.

These experiences are what led me to visit a USC therapist. I went in mentioning OCD potentially. The therapist wasn't sure that that was the case and mentioned potentially ADHD but recommended I get tested. Since at most times in my life, I have been able to compensate, knowingly or unknowingly, there hasn't been an eminent need to receive help. However, experiences in the last couple of years have led others to tell me that testing would potentially provide some guidance as to how my brain functions. At the current moment, I feel like I am able to compensate relatively well but think testing could have the potential for being helpful now or in the future.

When did you first notice these concerns?

Mentioned in paragraphs above

Have these issues changed since you first noticed them?

- No Change

Have you ever been evaluated or diagnosed by a mental health or other health professionals (e.g., physician) as having a mental health problem?

- No

In what ways are you hoping this evaluation can help?

I am hoping that testing can provide some guidance as to how my brain functions that I can maybe use to guide my actions/decisions/etc in the future.

How is your sleep?

It's alright. I am not good at getting to bed because I am doing things at night so I am not inclined to get ready for bed so I usually go to bed late and that is challenging to my schedule and can mean not getting enough sleep depending on when I have to wake up. But I have an easy time falling asleep and staying asleep. I have roommates and even when their alarms go off, I am able to easily go back to sleep. If I don't get enough sleep, I'm not enthusiastic to get up. Regardless, I am not a morning person so it takes me some time to be brain functional in the morning.
